

Transatlantic relations in a new spin

The unexpected agreement between Juncker and Trump on 26 July indicate that relations between the European Union and United States are not necessarily as bad as seen by many, it was even seen as the start of a new Transatlantic Trade and Investment Partnership (TTIP). It shows that diplomacy is even more important in times of uncertainty. But has the EU, and Europe as a whole, understood the lesson, even more for its security relations with Uncle Sam? Is Europe starting to take its security more in its own hands?
