Thanks. See below with some additional bullets from my side.

- TikTok supports current version of the Code, as newcomers they are quite pleased with the experience and what they learned from the Code and the monitoring exercise so far. TikTok is currently adapting to it and would not see any particular development.
- TikTok is supportive of strengthening the engagement with trusted flaggers, through regular workshops, possibly in Dublin.
- They are especially interested in smaller workshops to explore particular issues. Of particular interest currently are transgender equality and sexual identity, and combating antisemitism, including with help of the IHRA definition.
- They will send suggestions on how to improve the methodology for the monitoring exercises (info received on 29/11)
- They support a repository of examples of hate speech
- The code can include more companies, especially from the gaming sector. As an example the code on disinformation has more companies on board.
- The idea that the use of automation/AI is ok needs to be stronger cemented. There is suspicious to it compared to human interaction, while it is a necessary tool.
- The political messaging around the code is important. If companies are criticised only, they will not want to be part of it.

Best,
