II State of play regarding the multilateral trade agenda

ESF (O'Toole): There is frustration in the services industry on the DDA. We have given some thought as to whether WTO-consistent plurilateral negotiations on services might advance things. If there is a real engagement on substance by the principal parties involved (40 countries) in services, then the DDA could make more progress. The US have been thinking about launching separate plurilateral negotiations. While there is a preference on the EU side with WTO-consistency to avoid MFN issues, focus needs to be on substance rather than on discussing legal issues, such as MFN, from the beginning. Also need to be mindful that since the Doha mandate was settled, economic conditions have changed dramatically. There are now more linkage between trade in goods and services, such as with data processing. Many new issues have overtaken the Doha process.
sectors are covered. But if it is not a WTO negotiation, there is a slim chance of turning it into WTO negotiations, because it needs agreement from all 153 members. That's why there are plurilateral negotiations within the WTO. Indeed, since the launching of the DDA the services industries have changed and so have the economic conditions. So far there has only been one round of negotiations in services, namely the GATS. Would be useful if you continue to reflect on how to advance.

Questions by ESF representatives:

-On ICT there have already been a number of very good comments. With regard to plurilateral services negotiations, there has already been a discussion last year.

COM ([Art.4.1 b]): the ICT principles are a good sign, even if they are not an internationally binding agreement.

ESF (Kerneis): [Out of scope]

As regards Doha negotiations on a plurilateral basis, let’s resume negotiations on issues where progress can be made. However, we do not favour an agreement outside of the WTO framework.
